TURNING CHATTER
INTO ACTION.

From Launch Buzz to Brand Learning

The Kurkure × Ching's launch created strong public chatter — driven by a bold flavour collaboration, celebrity-led storytelling, and the inherent curiosity of a desi-Chinese snack mashup.

The evaluation moved beyond surface-level buzz to understand what consumers were actually responding to, where the campaign was landing well, and where brand ownership needed sharpening.

"The core question was not only whether the campaign worked. It was whether both brands were getting equal value from the collaboration."

CORE QUESTION

Which brand consumers remembered, how they described the flavour, and whether the Ching's association was strong enough in public conversation.

CONSUMER SENTIMENT

WHAT CONSUMERS WERE SAYING

- Product idea praised — the desi-Chinese snack mashup genuinely excited consumers and sparked trial curiosity.
- Celebrity chemistry — ad energy and storytelling were widely appreciated across platforms.
- Flavour expectation gaps — some consumers questioned spice levels and how close the flavour matched real schezwan chutney.
- Naming confusion — ambiguity in how consumers remembered or named the collaboration, with Kurkure carrying stronger recall.

Who Owned the Conversation?

THE KEY FINDING

Kurkure naturally carried more conversation equity. Ching's needed stronger recall cues to claim its role more visibly.

As the host snack brand, Kurkure was the dominant name consumers reached for. Ching's added the flavour world and fusion credibility, but the study revealed it needed sharper ownership signals.

"Not just amplify the campaign, but make Ching's more central to how consumers talk about the product."

THE EQUITY SPLIT

KURKURE

Host brand equity — naturally carried more of the conversation, recall, and product naming.

CHING'S

Flavour credibility — added the fusion world and desi-Chinese legitimacy, but lower standalone recall.

THE REFRAME

Sharpen Ching's role — make the flavour partner more central to how consumers describe the product.

Turning a Collab Into a Campaign Platform

Rather than treating the launch as a one-off flavour drop, the study identified ways to stretch the collaboration into a broader participation-led platform.

Brand Recall

Strengthening Ching's recall cues so consumers naturally name both brands when talking about the product.

Consumption Occasions

Building clearer snacking moments and usage contexts that anchor the product in daily routines.

Influencer Strategy

Using creator content more directionally to drive flavour storytelling and Ching's brand association.

Consumer Participation

Inviting consumers into the next fusion idea — letting Ching's lead the conversation around bold, playful experimentation.

KURKURE'S ROLE

The snack platform and distribution engine — carrying trial, shelf presence, and mass awareness.

CHING'S ROLE

The flavour authority and fusion credibility — needing sharper cues to own the desi-Chinese narrative.

From Campaign Evaluation to Next-Phase Activation

The evaluation helped the brand understand not just campaign performance, but campaign potential — translating consumer reactions into sharper next-phase actions.

Brand Ownership

Identified how Ching's could gain stronger recall and ownership in consumer conversation.

Campaign Extensions

How the collaboration could be extended beyond launch week into a repeatable property.

Participation Model

Converting a successful launch into an audience-participation campaign platform.

MOST APPRECIATED INSIGHT

A successful launch is not the end of a collaboration — it's the start of a campaign platform

This reframe shifted the conversation from "did the campaign work?" to "how do we turn this into a repeatable, participation-led property that both brands can own?"
